The Role of Students in Building a Better Society

It is easy to think of students as people who are just waiting. They are waiting to graduate, waiting to earn money and waiting for the "real world" to start. This way of looking at things is backwards. Students are already an integral part of the society. In fact, students are often the ones willing to notice what is broken and speak up about it. They do this before life gets complicated with mortgages and the need for job security that makes everyone else stay quiet.

History shows us that this is true. Independence movements, civil rights marches and language protests, all had students at the front. It was not because students had more power than other people. It was because students had less to lose and more to organize.This spirit is seen in small ways today. We might see a student group pushing a college to fix a drain before a flood happens or a hostel wing running a blood donation drive just because they wanted to help.

What makes students helpful to society is not just being idealistic. It is because students are close to the change. College is often the time a person meets people from a different state, religion or income level as equals. They share a room or a mess table. That friction can be uncomfortable. That is where people test their assumptions and let them go. A society does not become less divided by listening to lectures about unity. A society becomes less divided when eighteen-year-olds argue and disagree but then still end up sharing notes before an exam.

None of this means we have to wait for a title or a leadership role. Helping at a local school, calling out a mean joke or showing up to vote are all ways to build society. These are just ways to help. The better society that people tell students to wait for is a society that students are already shaping now whether they realize it or not.
